My friend recommended me to use the cracked software. A: The file is just a set of instructions. It will not work without the software itself. The file structure for an executable is as follows: - |—— MANIFEST.MF - |—— License.rtf - |—— README.txt - |—— tools.cfg - |—— webstart.jar Inside the tools.cfg file is where all of the information pertaining to the product is stored. Tools.cfg contains the following code: [Installers] licenseFile = C:\path\to\license.rtf id=715 [Components] productId=8sa8d5d3d082707a9ad00ae243bf6fe6 productId is used by products to identify themselves. id refers to the binary id of the launcher. So this software uses id to tell the software itself that you are using a cracked copy of Edraw MindMaster. Q: IIS7 Request Handlers and Application Pools I've got an application that consumes a WCF service that I am hosting in IIS7 using Application Request Routing. The service I consume uses Http channels, and to consume the service I've got a (and its companion jin my web project. So, the question is this: is it a bad practice to instantiate a particular HttpChannel within the request handler . e.g. - f678ea9f9e
